Excerpt: . . . was properly to be regarded as a class of itself, and because there was no general law covering the conditions there involved. The special law now under inquiry is directed and confined to a case for which ample provision is made by an existing general law, and hence it is an enactment which the Constitution plainly and positively prohibits. Statutes: date for becoming effective. Repeats by implication. Tax exemptions discretion of Legislature; mortgages held by domestic fire insurance companies; Chapter 197 of the Acts of 1914. Under section 31 of Article 3 of the Constitution, unless otherwise provided in the terms of a statute, an Act of the Legislature becomes effective on the 1st of June following its passage. pp. 383-334 Repeal of statutes by mere implication are never favored by the courts. p-335 It is only when there is a plain, unavoidable repugnancy...
