Excerpt: . . . of the hour; and immediately afterwards a lesser bell began to chime as for a service. Doubtless there was Mass in that chapel where the light looked in through the wonderful stained-glass that the Comtesse Agla had once described. . . Such browns, such blues! The young man hurried over his dressing. The air that came in through the wide-open casement was charged with a little mist, tart of the unripened hour. The sluggish breath of the moat was in it, as ever; but there was sweetness from the hayfield, and over all a homely yet distinctly foreign tang--odours of woodsmoke and of fresh roasting coffee. Through the high shaft of his window he had glimpses of a dew-besprinkled, pearly, vapour-hung world; the poplar-trees glistened like silver and between parting white clouds there were lakes of exquisite pale blue. He heard the clink of...
