Excerpt: . . . from an entry in the registers of St. Eustache, being Thomas Quinault, maitre boulanger, et Perrine Riquier, sa femme, demeurants Rue de Grenelle. More fortunate than many of the bourgeoisie at that period, he received a good education, a circumstance which proves that Quinault pere was not under the necessity of sending him out to service. Before entering his teens he attracted the notice of Tristan, who, alive to his precocious intelligence and engaging manners, treated him with almost paternal tenderness. Naturally enough, he soon came to sympathize with the poet in his tastes and pursuits, and in the result Les Rivales was written. By means of the money he received for this work, with some added by Tristan, he was placed with an Avocat au Conseil. Nor was it simply by the success of this comedy that he justified the interest which Tristan took in the development of his youthful promise. Handsome, vivacious, sociable, and modest, Quinault was esteemed by all with whom he came into contact, or at least with all those who were not induced by jealousy of his natural and acquired advantages to disparage him. No less successful than Les Rivales was a comedy by the author of the disastrously unsuccessful Arijvfiifle of a few months before. Le Pedant Jbu, as it was called, had two noteworthy features. It was written in P1-Se, and a peasant in the piece, contrary to all precedent, was made to speak in the jargon of his...
