In comparing the cementing power of two mixtures the results may be entirely contrary if the operation is carried out in an ordinary clay-luted box to what they would be if the operation were carried out as indicated above, or in a large wrought iron gas tube whose ends are closed with perforated screwed caps. Comparative results which have been obtained at one temperature can also not be used to predict the results obtainable at a different temperature, nor does it follow that the relative behaviour of two materials used, say, for six hours at 900 C. will be preserved if the time is extended to twenty hours. These conclusions may be deduced from a study of the two tables on page 97, which show that carburising reagents become exhausted at different temperatures. Similar conclusions are supported by actual cementing observations. Consider,...
